

About Us

LWF Iraq has been responding to the priorities of internally displaced persons (IDPs), returnees, and host communities since the conflict started in 2014. With the active conflict over and IDPs gradually moving back to their areas of origin, LWF Iraq is strengthening holistic programming integrating a rights-based approach. The program is expanding its areas of operation, especially in GoI through local partners, in order to support returnees and host communities to rebuild their lives, while continuing to support IDPs, in Iraqi Kurdistan.

Issa Ahmed Ali, 28, Mukhtar of Kani-Spi Neighborhood in Sumel District, shared the challenges his community faced before the construction of a formal water network. Informal water connections were purchased and installed directly by residents and often broke during new house constructions, making it costly and unreliable.

LWF's intervention, building a formal network, significantly improved the situation. "I thank LWF for allowing me to oversee the project as part of the supervisory committee," Issa said. The project alleviated water scarcity and brought positive change, providing the community with a reliable and regulated water supply.

My name is Younis, a 21-year-old University of Duhok student who participated in LWF's Communication Skills Training. Despite being born with low vision, my determination has driven me to impact my community. The training, which brought together diverse individuals, fostered coexistence and effective communication.

Over three days, I engaged in workshops and discussions that enhanced my skills in active listening, expression, and empathetic communication. This experience highlighted the power of words, body language, and advocacy in creating positive change. It reinforced the importance of empowering individuals to share their stories and bridge gaps for a more inclusive environment.
